Hogewey, a self-contained dementia village in the Netherlands is attracting visitors from all over the world.

Complete with a market, café and theater, residents have freedom to walk around the courtyards and shops as they please. As a result, they are on fewer medications, eat better and live longer.

Donna Phillips, a graduate student in Aging Services Management at the University of Southern California, recently travelled there, and will share her experiences, as well as insights as to how the management and staff brought about this ultimate example of culture change.
